PHILADELPHIA, PA - (July 30, 2018) The Print Center is pleased to present two new solo exhibitions featuring work by Philadelphia artists Rochelle Toner and Lauren Pakradooni, curated by John Caperton, formerly The Print Center's Jensen Bryan Curator. Both Toner and Pakradooni consider printmaking to be the core of their artistic practice, and together these two exhibitions illustrate the ways that the processes and central themes of printmaking can fruitfully expand into other media and forms.

Rochelle Toner: Tying a Knot in a Cherry Stem is an exhibition of recent, abstract, watercolor drawings and collages by the highly regarded printmaker. Her newer works are complemented by a selection of early prints, as well as items from the artist's idiosyncratic collections of objects from which she draws artistic inspiration. A commissioned essay published in the exhibition brochure, written by independent curator Judith Tannenbaum, discusses Toner's latest projects in respect to her earlier works, exploring themes that reoccur over the decades. Lauren Pakradooni: Static Slip highlights the work of this emerging artist, whose practice begins with printmaking and expands into sculpture.

Though Rochelle Toner's work has been included in numerous group exhibitions in the Philadelphia area over the last 40 years, it has not received the critical attention that it merits. Having spent 30 years dedicated to academic service, coupled with the lack of support which women (especially queer women) of her generation received in the art world, much of Toner's extensive body of work remains unexhibited and unknown. While Toner identifies as a printmaker, her most current works are watercolors, collages and drawings. The watercolors are diverse, vibrantly colored organic abstractions, many with linear repeating forms. After many years of making watercolors, the artist has produced 2 series of collages made from magazine pages. While many of the collages relate visually to the abstracted organic forms of the watercolor drawings, the most recent are composed of the cut-up and reassembled body parts of fashion models. A third body of work included is a series of drawings rendered directly onto plate pages of a 19th century natural history book. The show features more than 40 works from these 3 series, as well as a selection of the artist's previous works, including ambitiously-scaled Surrealist etchings from the early 1970s.

"These watercolor drawings, prints and collages, as well as the other work that I have made over the years, I think of collectively as 'nature, pleasure and innuendo'. I like the way the phrase sounds and I like the sort of sexy allusion. I am fascinated by the way abstraction can evolve from a process of observing, distilling and internalizing information, conscious and subconscious interactions."

To provide deeper insight into Toner's work, several installations of objects and ephemera drawn from her idiosyncratic personal collections are presented. Ranging from a selection of roughly crafted iron shears to groupings of shells and fossils, these objects illuminate many of the underlying ideas with which Toner is concerned. They reflect an ongoing interest in the simultaneous violence and beauty embodied by tools, the ways that some types of labor lead to objects being imbued with a sense of gender and her unabashed love for the wonders of the natural world.

"Without planning or specific intention I came to notice that the single most important theme or common denominator in my work was/is the concept of dynamics.

...forces and their relation primarily to motion but sometimes also to equilibrium...
a process of change, growth, or activity...
variation and contrast in force or intensity"

The exhibition and its accompanying essay by Judith Tannenbaum, who has been familiar with Toner's oeuvre since the 1990s, contextualizes Toner's work within the larger field. Additionally, coinciding with The Print Center's exhibition, a book on Toner's drawings will be published by Temple Contemporary, Tyler School of Art, Temple University, Philadelphia, authored by Director Robert Blackson.

While Lauren Pakradooni is primarily an object maker, printmaking is core to her practice. The artist utilizes etching, monotype and screenprinting to make works that sometimes exist as traditional prints, but also are used as components of her sculptural work. Pakradooni applies prints to the surface of constructed forms made from materials such as papier-mâché, wood, foam, acrylic, glass, plastic, plaster and fabric.

“I am consistently expanding and inventing new ways of using print techniques that experiment with implied dimension, low-relief, and sculptural applications of print media” says Pakradooni.

“Imagery is screenprinted and then seamlessly applied to sculpted forms, to create trompe l'oeil or faux surface texture. Traditional intaglio and relief prints are embossed, giving the paper a sculptural quality that becomes visible in raking light.”

The content of Pakradooni’s work is derived from architecture and industrial design to create what she calls “a tenuous fantasy of half-constructed and half-collapsed forms and fragments.” Many of her works resemble studies, models or debris, and appear to be fragments of larger built structures that are either coming into existence or crumbling away. The imagery of the prints adhered to the surface of these constructions often refers to building materials such as brick or stucco, further complicating the pieces while often obscuring what they are actually built from. Many of the core concerns of printmaking, including repetition, image construction through layering and the use of mediated processes rather than direct mark making, are critical to her works.

About the Artists

Rochelle Toner is an artist and educator based in Philadelphia. She earned a BA at the University of Northern Iowa, Cedar Falls in 1962, received an MA in Art and Art Education in 1967 and an MFA in Painting and Printmaking in 1970, both from the University of Illinois, Urbana. About the Essayist

Judith Tannenbaum is known locally for her extensive curatorial work in her position as Curator, Associate Director and Interim Director at the Institute of Contemporary Art, Philadelphia from 1986 – 2000 and as Richard Brown Baker Curator of Contemporary Art at the Museum of Art, Rhode Island School of Design (RISD), Providence from 2000 - 2013. When she retired from RISD in 2013 she was happy to return to her adopted home, Philadelphia, where she works as an independent curator.

About The Print Center

For more than a century, The Print Center has encouraged the growth and understanding of photography and printmaking as vital contemporary arts through exhibitions, publications and educational programs. The Print Center has an international voice and a strong sense of local purpose. Free and open to the public, it presents changing exhibitions which highlight established and emerging, local, national and international contemporary artists. It mounts one of the oldest art competitions in the country, now in its 93rd year, and the Gallery Store offers the largest selection of contemporary prints and photographs available for sale in Philadelphia.
