Anastasia Samoylova: FloodZone

September 24 – November 13, 2021

The Print Center
The Print Center is pleased to present selections from “FloodZone” by Anastasia Samoylova, a photographic series that examines the quiet but omnipresent effects of climate change on Miami, Florida. Begun in 2016, the project, which also encompasses a book published in 2019 by Steidl, is an observational study subtly documenting human impact on the tropical landscape. Through natural disasters, specifically hurricanes and their resulting floods, Samoylova sounds the alarm on rising sea levels. Selections from “FloodZone” have been exhibited widely, including most recently at the Orlando Museum of Art and the Multimedia Art Museum in Moscow, Russia. We are grateful to Curatorial Assistant Rosemary Haynes for her assistance in preparing the exhibition.

Anastasia Samoylova: FloodZone

Climate change is real. The artist Anastasia Samoylova has been sounding the alarm on it for years. From her childhood in the taiga of Russia, through her education in the prairie of the American Midwest, to her life today in the tropics of Miami, Samoylova has been committed to representing her environs. Her work is rooted in Russian Constructivism, an early 20th century style of art native to her homeland that favors geometric shapes and an understanding of the world as assembled from disparate parts. This influence is seen clearly in her series “Landscape Sublime.” Initiated in 2015, it is comprised of copyright-free images culled from the internet, collaged into Cubo-Futurist maquettes, that she then photographed. Samoylova’s early projects also include an exploration of the visual relationships between agriculture and genetically modified foods. Since 2016, when she relocated to Miami, Samoylova has addressed climate change head-on.

The exhibition Anastasia Samoylova: FloodZone features a selection of large-scale photographs from the ongoing series of the same name, which meditates on the effects of rising water levels as a result of global warming. “FloodZone” does not present us with the familiar images of climate catastrophe, but its traces in the everyday – from corners of dilapidated buildings and pools of stagnant water to sidewalks with battered trees and skylines of upturned billboards. “FloodZone” uses the cacophony of natural and human-made colors and forms to make visual patterns out of the landscape. Hidden in plain sight, amongst the seafoam green, hues of baby pink and deep tones of red, Samoylova presents evidence of the fleeting nature of this perceived paradise. She appropriates its clichés – reworking them, exaggerating them, resisting them.

As a whole, “FloodZone” is an observational portrait of a civilization gone awry. Based in the documentary tradition of American photography as seen in the works of Walker Evans and Dorothea Lange, it tells more than just the urgent narrative of rising water levels in Florida. Its images can be transposed to coastal communities around the world – including ours in Philadelphia, as recently demonstrated in the aftermath of Hurricane Ida. People, whose actions directly affect the environment, rarely appear in her photographs. Instead, they can be found in the shadows, haunting the edges. With a majority of the work 30” x 40” or larger, Samoylova invites the viewer into her photographs as a means of shared culpability.

An integral part of this exhibition are the pages of FloodZone, a book titled after the series published in 2019 by Steidl. By displaying the spreads, the book is treated as an object, drawing attention to the sequence of its images. This allows for comparisons and contrasts to be drawn between images as well as across the book. Laid bare is the photographer’s challenge of paring down the project from hundreds or even thousands of photographs. Sequenced by Samoylova with the renowned photo historian and curator David Campany, the book is not an addendum to, but a critical component of the project “FloodZone.”

Alongside the book, the exhibition includes prints from the series and a site-specific installation in The Print Center’s iconic bay window. Entitled Gator, the latter is the most iconic image of the project. An alligator’s body is pictured floating effortlessly underwater. It was taken in a preserve on Watson Island, adjacent to Miami Beach. With his limbs limp, the alligator is a far cry from being a predator, but the mere prospect of his attack is haunting. In the context of Samoylova’s work, its impending threat is a metaphor for the climate changes threatening our planet. Fountain, another important work from the series, highlights the trope of water as a mirror, reflecting back onto humanity. Samoylova identifies this in both the natural and human made – from pools of accumulated rainwater to the windows of beachfront high-rise condominiums. Reflection is a central theme in The Print Center’s selection from the series. It calls upon the viewer to not only look closely at, but also deeply into, the photographs meditating on our rapidly changing climate.
